

HOME-RUN CLOUT BY GARDNER PAVES WAY

Timely Clout by Red Sox Third Sacker Overcomes Dodgers Two-Run Lead.

fight of the ball in that attitude of dejection with which he viewed the flight of the pellets pounded by Baker back in 1911 and 1913.

Game Practically Over.

What followed thereafter was merely incidental. The game was to all intents and purposes over.

Robinson let Marquard remain in the box until the fifth, although the Red Sox hit him for another run. In the fourth Lewis singled to left. Gardner sacrificed and Morey threw out Scott, Carrigan singled to center, scoring Lewis.

In the eighth and ninth George "Napoleon" Rucker did the pitching for the Dodgers, and that was one of the features of the afternoon. Since 1907 Rucker has been a member of the Dodgers, and most of that time he has been on the star staff of the country. Some hold that he was at his best, one of the greatest southpaws of all time.

Through the best years of his career, however, he pitched for a losing ball club. Many fans have always expressed a desire to see him in a world's series just as they have always wanted to see Walter Johnson in such a battle. But the distinction did not come to Rucker until these sere and yellow days in his pitching life, when his greatest assets are his knowledge and a very, very slow ball.

One Hit Off Rucker.

The Red Sox got one off him in two innings, and he struck out three men.

Cheney passed Hooper in the fifth and Hooper stole as Janvrin fanned, the last strike also being a short-passed ball.

Hooper scored on Hoblitzel's double across third.

Cheney fanned Gardner, Scott and Leonard in the sixth, although Carrigan dropped a safe hit in between Scott and the pitcher.

In the seventh Hooper singled and was forced by Janvrin, who took second on Walker's out, and scored when Cheney's throw of Hoblitzel's hit Hoblitzel in the back and bounced out of Mirkle's reach. From fair out on the right field foul line Umpire Tommy Callahan covered a man on top of the left field stand about the sixth inning, with a mirror in his hand. The man seemed to be trying to flash the light in the eyes of the Boston batters, and he was speedily dispersed when Tommy rushed in to the diamond, held up the game and exposed the plot.

Jess Willard might be able to train down to Kid Williams' weight, but nobody thinks that members of the Giants will get Christmas presents from the Phils.
